Case Report

A 60-year-old male patient with a long history of hypertension and hyperlipidemia presented to the emergency department with a 2-day history of severe, constant, retrosternal chest pain. The pain was described as a heavy, crushing sensation, radiating to the left arm and jaw. The patient had no associated symptoms of shortness of breath, sweating, or nausea. He was on a daily regimen of lisinopril and atorvastatin. His medical history was significant for a previous myocardial infarction 10 years ago, treated with percutaneous coronary intervention. He had no known allergies and was not taking any other medications. On arrival, his vital signs were stable, and physical examination was unremarkable. An electrocardiogram (ECG) showed ST-segment depression in leads II, III, and aVF, and ST-segment elevation in leads V1 and V2. Initial laboratory tests, including troponin T and creatine kinase-MB, were within normal limits. The patient was administered aspirin, clopidogrel, and intravenous morphine for pain management. A computed tomography (CT) scan of the chest was performed to rule out aortic dissection, which showed no abnormalities. Given the clinical presentation and ECG findings, a diagnosis of non-ST-elevation myocardial infarction (NSTEMI) was made. The patient was admitted to the cardiac care unit and received dual antiplatelet therapy with aspirin and clopidogrel. A stress test was scheduled for the following day to assess his functional capacity. The patient's symptoms improved with treatment, and he was discharged on the second day of admission with a plan for continued medical management and follow-up.
